

Airblack is sitting on a 10-lakh person warm funnel that isn't plugged into anything

Zudo which Airblack Technologies built and launched in November 2024 now has over 10 lakh learners actively completing courses in beauty, business, Instagram growth, YouTube, fashion, and nutrition. It is downloaded 880,000 times a month. It is, by any measure, working.

Airblack Beauty Club has 35,000 paying members, an NPS of 72, an 80% course completion rate, and a 4.85 student rating numbers that most edtech companies would retire on. It is also, by any measure, working.

What isn't working is the connection between them. There is no in-app prompt inside Zudo that nudges a beauty course completely toward a free Beauty Club workshop. There is no taster cohort seeded from Zudo's top learners. There is no funnel data tracking who moves from one product to the other. The two best things Airblack has built are sitting next to each other without talking.

The math is straightforward. If 0.5% of Zudo's active learners see a single well-placed CTA after completing a beauty course, that is 5,000 people. If 20% of those attend a free seminar which is a standard offline edtech conversion rate, and Airblack already runs seminars in 50+ cities that is 1,000 people. If 20% of those convert to paid enrollment, that is 200 new members per quarter. At an average course fee of ₹15,000, that is ₹30 lakhs of incremental revenue every quarter. The customer acquisition cost on every single one of those enrolments is zero, because they are already inside your ecosystem.

Compare that to what Airblack currently spends to acquire a cold learner through paid digital ₹800 to ₹1,200 per enrolment. The Zudo funnel is not just free. It is faster, warmer, and more likely to complete the course because the learner already trusts the product before they pay.

Building this requires three things, in order. The first is a single in-app prompt inside Zudo, triggered after a beauty course completion: "Get certified and attend a free live workshop in your city." This is a two-week product sprint, not a new feature. The seminar infrastructure already exists. The second is one free taster DIT session per month, seeded from Zudo's top beauty completers. Run it the same way as a regular Beauty Club session. Track who converts to pay. This gives you a real, data-driven conversion rate not an assumption that you can present internally and to investors. The third is a Metabase funnel that makes the whole thing visible: Zudo course completion → CTA click → seminar registration → enrollment. Once that dashboard exists, you can optimize every step.
